A battery electrode consists of a metallic substrate, typically a metal foil, coated with an electrically conductive electrolyte. The electrolyte is in contact with the metallic substrate. The electrolyte can be an acid, an alkali or a combination of one or more acids and/or alkalis, a polymer electrolyte, or a salt solution containing a salt, typically a lithium salt, such as LiClO<sub>4</sub>. The electrolyte acts as a medium in which an electrochemical reaction is produced, and acts to provide ionic conduction between the anode and cathode. The electrochemical reaction produces a product of the reaction. Often the product of the reaction is the metal which forms the substrate of the anode. The metal can take many different forms, such as Li metal, alloys or a combination thereof, and can be deposited onto the metallic substrate by a variety of techniques. An anode can be deposited onto a metallic substrate by several methods. One such method is electrodeposition from an aqueous
