drama sexyThe International Federation of Organic Agriculture Movement (IFOAM) has brought a new component to the popular swap meet, farmers' market and CSA model. It's called an integrated marketing and sale location or IMSL, and it is used worldwide by local food businesses to reach customers on an individual basis. IMSLs are built using a combination of traditionally used components: an onsite farm with a CSA or CSAT offering; farmer-managed stand; and a manufacturing facility. It's a site where on-site produce stands, such as the stands affiliated with the local farmers' markets and CSAs, are connected to a large-scale manufacturing plant. The idea is that these operations would be located in close proximity to one another and easy to access by customers. Imsls are perfect for vibrant urban areas where large swaths of vacant and under-used land are available. And according to Josh Lifshutz, program director for the Center for Urban Agriculture at Oregon State University, their emergence is a direct response to the increase in urban agriculture and the number of urban residents who want local food, especially locally grown fruits and vegetables. "As living space gets more expensive," Lifshutz says, "people want to be in more of a community and in a more localized way, so farmers markets are something they're much more comfortable with." At the same time, he says, "people are getting interested in where their food comes from and what is in it." At the heart of the IMSL model is access to a local food niche. It's not just a place to buy produce; it's also a place to buy the ingredients for community food projects, such as community meals. Lifshutz says many IMSLs incorporate a small manufacturing component. At the IFOAM's annual event, the 2013 European IMSL Conference, organizers displayed an array of food processing equipment. Another trend is to build an IMSL using a kitchen for the onsite farm and also a kitchen or other facility for the processing operations. "This gives us a large canning,

The newest version, Cisco UTM 10.1, contains more than 100 security fixes. The most notable of them is support for Microsoft Office 2013, which has recently been disclosed as being prone to a Remote Code Execution vulnerability. If a user opens up or prints to an Office file that is vulnerable, an attacker can execute code on the affected machine. The vulnerability, which was announced on Aug. 31, is currently being exploited in the wild. "A remote code execution vulnerability in Microsoft Office 2013 could allow an attacker to execute arbitrary code on the affected system. The vulnerability is due to insufficient input validation in the Object Repository. An attacker could exploit this vulnerability by tricking the user into opening a document, document library, mail item, email, or calendar item that is affected. An attacker could then execute arbitrary code on the affected system," Cisco says. Another user-facing issue fixed in the latest release is the behavior of remote IP addresses when gateway address resolution is disabled. During normal operation, a user only needs to enter a remote IP address, such as the IP address of a web server, an application server, a database, a file server, or a print server. When gateway address resolution is disabled, users can enter any IP address to access a resource. "Cisco UTM allows for the remote configuration of gateway address resolution settings. It is critical to understand that when gateway address resolution is disabled, anyone can perform network address translation (NAT) masquerading attacks on the Internet," the company says. "When gateway address resolution is disabled, the NAT behavior of the client is preserved if the IP address of the client was allowed to be translated in the same way that the IP address of the target is translated on the Internet e79caf774b
