Remote forcing of large-scale atmospheric phenomena can generate regional climate change. One such remote forcing mechanism, oceanic upwelling, is most pronounced in the nutrient-rich waters of the Pacific Ocean and produces a northward propagating cyclonic circulation that strengthens during boreal summer and winter. The southern boundary of this system, which is poleward of 27 degrees N, is associated with a unique anomalous pathway for atmospheric heat transport (the Kuroshio Current) that is cold year-round. Because of the influence of several topographic features, the rate of ocean upwelling, in the main, increases exponentially toward the south as one approaches the Tropic of Cancer. Since the formation of the Kuroshio Current is influenced by strong oceanographic winds, which are affected by the regional ocean circulation, the position of the Kuroshio and the inshore upwelling from the western North Pacific and, hence, the remote forcing onto atmospheric circulation, can change dramatically with time. Also because of the large scale of the Kuroshio, it significantly influences the development and ocean circulation in the northwestern North Pacific through its interaction with the Kuroshio-Easterly Jet and the cold Hadley Cell. Here we present evidence that the poleward trajectory of the Kuroshio and adjacent upwelling is being significantly altered, causing the previously observed winter warming in the North Pacific to abate. Comparison of model-simulated current fields and historical observations show that the modified poleward trajectory of upwelling is consistent with the observed evolution of the North Pacific waters over the past 50 years. A decrease in the poleward propagating cyclonic overturning of the upper layer of the ocean, which is projected to increase with future warming, is a signature of this climate response.PHOENIX – A few hours before the Grizzlies’ 108-99 loss to the Suns on Saturday, fans outside of the arena didn’t look like the visiting team. The response started before the final buzzer. Fans chanted insults against the Suns and Bucks, officers, and even President Donald Trump – who is a regular NBA fan. “The thing is, people in this country are proud of the fact that we’re Americans,

But so far, only a minority of Americans are willing to pay for the education of their own countrymen. This week, USAID put out a solicitation for an $85 million contract with the U.S. Army to train 6,000 police officers for the Afghan National Police, a move that could mean more money for private security companies and fewer cops on the beat. USAID's intent is to hire 2,000 Afghans "from the communities" who will provide security at government schools, a response to the government's failure to take responsibility for educating children in urban areas. But even if that plan works, a poll of American taxpayers shows that the vast majority won't fork over another penny to the Afghan government for education until poverty is fully eradicated and education programs become merit based. The $85 million contract with the Army has been covered in breathless media reports for a year, and there's nothing new here. What we have now is an enhanced version of the 2010 USAID solicitation for the controversial $1.3 billion contract with Academi, the private security firm that manages a special forces unit that has been accused of atrocities in Afghanistan, including conducting interrogations in which at least two people died. The 2011 solicitation changed the Army's minimum requirements for the Afghan 6d1f23a050
